AMONG THE PERSONALS

By H. E. TWINELLS.

Copyright, 1910, by the Pearson Publishing company.

Tillinghast inclined forward from the waist in a conventional bow and impressively raised his hat to the Frenchy little woman just entering the Astor. She looked him full in the eyes with an impudent stare and brushed past.

"I say, that's cool now," drawled young Tillinghast, turning to his companion, a modish young fellow, who would have been perfect as a fashion plate, had it not been for the slight advantage Tillinghast had of him in poise and polish.

"Who is she? It would hurt less to be cut by a more plain-looking person," admitted the other, watching the trim little form as it disappeared through the massive entrance.

"Mademoiselle Flora Flaubert," said Tillinghast, with a flourish of his slender Piccadilly stick. "She maneuvers my sister's face. It's odd, you know; habit should have caused her to recognize and respect the bearer of a Tillinghast face. I am disappointed in Flaubert."

"Oh, she's the complexion person from Paris, who's been taking in society at the Plaza the past six months. Tyson has been glowing of her for a month. I hope Papa Tyson learns of it in time to keep Tommy from doing anything silly."

Tommy better look out for Flaubert," Tillinghast said wistfully, as he paused on the corner. "She's very clever! Gets her business with her face, you know, and keeps it with her hands—and cheek. I have seen prima donnas who haven't half her charm—and cheek. But I'm running over to the club from here. You're not coming?"

"No," By-By, replied the other, starting down Broadway after adding, "I hope you weren't nipped by the slight frost from Flaubert?"

"Well, I'll feel an outcast if I meet my sister's milliner and she cuts me," laughed Tillinghast, crossing alone on Forty-second to Fifth Avenue and going leisurely to the smoking room of the Van Rensselaer Club, where he cocked his feet on the fender before the celebrate jade fireplace, helped himself to some "V. R." punch his fathers before him had drunk, and idly fingered over the morning Herald, though it was full afternoon.

He struck an item and read it several times, some of his languor leaving him. A friend dropped into a seat beside him, noted his interest, and queried: "Reading the President's message, Tillinghast?"

"Oh, hello," drawled Tillinghast, looking up and allowing the paper to slip idly through his longish fingers, as smooth in texture as fresh bank notes. "No, I'm not concerned in the street or trusts. Sometimes I'm really tempted to take a flyer in stock so I can get up an interest in messages to Congress, the condition of the country, the gold standard in Nicaragua, and that sort of thing."

"I presume reading the fashions is more in your line?"

"No," said Tillinghast, with an annoyed frown. "My tailor takes care of that. Really, I can't bother my head about cravats and waistcoats; it's quite bad enough to have to carry them about."

"Newspapers are deadly dull, aren't they?" said the other, switching back. "It's really work to read the news, but one must keep up in these commercial times, you know."

"I seldom read anything but the 'Personals,'" admitted Tillinghast idly. "One finds such queer things. A frantic lady, you know, advertising for a lost poodle; a deserted wife wailing her woe through the public prints and telling Terence to come home, drunk or sober, defiant or repentant, all being forgiven—but not forgotten."

"Why can't people settle their little domestic troubles through a solicitor and not get into the awful glare of publicity?"

"Oh, I dare say nobody reads the 'Personals,'" said Tillinghast quickly. "They're so impersonal, you know."

"Not in our set, of course. But there are fortune-hunters and the like, I suppose, who use the column continually."

"Oh, yes. They're a sordid lot. Now look at this, for instance," Tillinghast recovered the paper with an easy stoop and pointed to the following advertisement:

"Yes, I presume so," answered Tillinghast indifferently.

"But what's she been getting into?" "Oh, nothing, I suppose. This advertisement was probably inserted by some frantic wife customer who found that Flaubert had moved away, and didn't know she could be located at the Astor."

"You aren't following her goings and comings, too?" asked the other, raising his eyebrows.

Tillinghast smiled faintly and shook his head. The other man reread the advertisement and shuddered: "Brazen! Isn't it? Now, if a woman wants her features carried or remodeled, why can't she get one of those simple home beautifiers, with an adjustable handle, in a splendid japanned box, or go quietly to Doctor Woodbury? Think of signing one's name to such a deliciously frank advertisement!"

"Yes," mused Tillinghast, "Flaubert wouldn't wish it known that she has a customer in the west Two hundred on Thirty-fifth Street. It's all cheap theatrical buff over there. That's hardly Flaubert's class of trade."

HE TOLD 'EM WHAT'S WHAT

that I simply must go to the senate or bust."

There was a good deal more to the same general purpose. The colonel admitted several times that he would like to go to the senate, but he said there was another matter in which he was even more deeply interested and that was the direct primary. And he admitted he would rather be under the daisies with that primary in good working order than be sent to the senate by any nefarious old style method that prevails in nearly all the states.

The colonel said he had formed a solemn resolution at the beginning of the campaign not to talk in any speech more than half an hour, but he broke his vow last night to the discomfort of the audience which, along about the time he passed the first quarter post began to manifest some uneasiness. However, all things in this world come to an end some time and the colonel's speech was no exception. And then Cobb took the floor.

Mr. Cobb, who is trying to beat Carl Hayden and Mulford Winsor in the race for congress, can hardly be said to be a public speaker. He told the usual story about standing for the people and the people's rights; declared for the constitution which he helped to make; admitted his liking for the direct primary, and promised if elected to do his best for the suffering people of Arizona. Mr. Cobb, though, really created quite a favorable impression but it can hardly be said that he will be embarrassed by the number of votes he won by his speech.

The first business of the meeting was the adoption of a resolution introduced by George Purdy Bullard to arrange for a democratic meeting here the evening of November 9 and a mass meeting the following evening. It is the intention to invite democrats from all sections of the territory for those meetings, which will occur at the time of the territorial fair.
